

What if it's true?

The question sent Peter racing open hearted to discover for himself that everything he thought impossible is astonishingly true; just as the women said. He must have stood there in shocked silence, stooping over staring into that dark tomb as if he were staring into the heart of mysterious dark depths of the universe, a few white cloths bearing witness of the body once there. His mind unable to contain the meaning, his heart more frightened joyfully than ever.

When you pursue the question of faith - what if it's true – you may come to this wondrous place: amazed at what happened. Or as another translation says, Peter went home, wondering what happened.

We can only discover what the resurrection of Jesus Christ actually means by living into its truth with wonder and amazement. Wonder is not a moment in time; it's a way of life. It is living in what Saint Paul calls "the power of the resurrection."
